Getting Youth Involved

The desire to have youth on the Maine State Board of Education started several years ago and like a lot of things, it took time to transform this from an idea into a reality. Jim Carignan, who chaired the Maine State Board of Education at that time, was instrumental in this process along with other board members and adult community members who felt passionate about the idea. These adults decided to first go to local area youth to ask them to help create a legislative proposal with the intent of turning the idea of having two youth on the Maine State Board of Education into Maine law. This information was shared with the full board who endorsed the idea. Senator Libby Mitchell was asked to sponsor a bill to bring youth representatives to the Maine State Board of Education. Other legislators advocated for this bill, such as Representative David Farrington, who submitted the bill. After moving through the proper channels, LD 151 was voted into law.

Next, funding had to be secured to help ensure that two youth members would be appointed in a thorough and inclusive manner and also that time and energy would be spent talking with youth in Maine about how they might envision young people being involved in educational public policy for years to come.

In order to accomplish the two over-arching goals of appointing two youth to the Board of Education and creating systems to support youth involvement in educational policy making in the future, the State Board of Education sought out a partner organization. The Maine Youth Action Network (MYAN), a program of the People’s Regional Opportunity Program, was hired to support this initiative. MYAN worked with the youth appointed to the board and with youth throughout the State of Maine to encourage youth voice and participation in educational policy at all levels.
